A NEW PHILANTHROPY.

Pennsylvania has a new philanthropy called a Legal Aid society, the purpose of which is to furnish legal advice to those who are unable to pay for it. At first glance it would seem that the principal business of such an organization would be to promote legal complications and lawsuits. The name of the association apparently indicates that its object in being is to pursue ambulances, to use the corporation lawyer's phrase, and to bring damage suits wherever possible.

If you have formed such an impression you may dismiss it from your mind at once. The society has no such purpose. On the contrary, wherever possible lawsuits are discouraged. Always, if an amicable settlement can be brought about outside of court, this is the action taken. The last annual report of the society gives a good idea of its aims and objects. According to this report 272 cases were handled for indigent clients.

Sixty-two of these were proceedings by wives against husbands for ill-treatment and desertion. The report divides the remainder of the cases as follows:

"To recover damages for injuries caused by negligence, 14; for the recovery of personal property, 32; testamentary cases, 18; patent rights, 3; for the recovery of real estate, 18; to enforce contracts, 18; landlord and tenant cases, 26; collection of wages, 32; debts 5; pensions, 1; assault and battery, 5; adoption, 4; to determine the custody of children, 12; against loan companies, 21."

The report says that the time of the attorneys has been taken up to a large extent in looking after the interests of foreigners who are ignorant of the law and of very poor people who stood in danger of losing their rights through unjust legal processes. The aim of the society is, we are told, to prevent such wrongs and to see that equal and exact justice is measured out to all.

The philanthropy looks like a worthy one. As no fees are charged to any client, no matter what the case may be, always provided the client is a worthy one, the society is not and cannot be self-supporting. The lawyers who look after the business give as much of their time as they can and the other expenses are made up by donations.

We cannot but reflect, however, that the necessity for this society does not speak well for Pennsylvania. It is quite evident that all men there are not equal before the law.
